Topic: Protecting Children from Bullying And Violence

South Korea is a country in South East Asia, located in the southern half of the Korean Peninsula. Its neighbor is North Korea. It occupies 750 miles of the Korean peninsula with its population of about 52 million people. South Korea is a democratic republic and Seoul is its capital. The economy is strong and highly developed, export- and technology-oriented, famous in the automotive industries and the country is also really active at global matters like the UN.

Unfortunately, children are being bullied worldwide. This problem could lead to negative outcomes such as poor relationships, being afraid of the public and much more. This happens especially in South Korea. South Korea believes that it would affect the future and it is really important to help solve problems. South Korean organizations like the Korean Child Fund are trying their best to make things better for children internationally. They protect children's rights, provide welfare programs and offer emergency and international aid. These efforts show that South Korea is actively working to help children. South Korea is ready to cooperate with the bodies of the UN in order to help achieving the sustainable goal of ending all forms of violence against children by 2030.

South Korea thinks that civilizations need to improve their safety concerning children. It is also important to give information about how children are treated and education about how they need to be treated. South Korea is ready to ensure working globally to make children's situation better all around the world.
