

Delegation: United States of America
Committee: CCPCJ
Agenda Item: Fighting Against New Emerging Crimes
Delegate Name: Yağız Kaan Uzun

The United States of America is highly aware of the rising threat of emerging crimes. These include cybercrime, environmental offenses, human trafficking, financial fraud, and the misuse of technology. These crimes often take advantage of weak laws, poor digital protection, and gaps between countries' legal systems. Many of these crimes cross national borders, which makes them harder to stop and more dangerous to global peace and safety.

These crimes have long-lasting and serious effects. They can harm economies, reduce trust in governments, and put people in danger. For example, cyberattacks can shut down systems of hospitals and banks putting them under risk. Illegal mining and deforestation harms the environment and local people. Scams and cryptocurrency fraud steal money from innocent people without getting caught. Human trafficking and smuggling harms people by destroying lives and families.

The United States recognizes that these problems cannot be solved by one country. Since these crimes affect all of us, solving them by international cooperation is essential. The U.S. supports working closely with the United Nations, Interpol, and other countries to build stronger laws, share information, and help developing nations improve their tools and skills to fight crime together.

The United States believes in the power of technology and how easy it makes our lives, but also recognizes its risks. It supports efforts to create global standards for the safe use of artificial intelligence and digital finance. The U.S. also supports education and awareness programs to help citizens protect themselves online. Increasing people's awareness is crucial to reduce the effect of crimes.

In this committee, the United States is ready to work with all nations to find realistic, sustainable, and effective solutions. The U.S. believes that together, we can build a safer world where people are protected from new and dangerous crimes.
