Topic : Tackling Youth Unemployment and Promoting Sustainable Economic Growth

With the increasing youth population in Saudi Arabia, the problem of youth unemployment is emerging as a significant issue for our country's economic future. The high proportion of young people in our country's total population, coupled with their participation in employment, is crucial for both economic growth and the sustainability of social life. We see the most significant problem created by the economic prosperity provided by our mineral resources as young people withdrawing from the workforce and becoming more lazy.

In this context, as part of our government's 2030 vision, we are implementing a number of innovations to offer new opportunities to young people by diversifying job opportunities and encouraging private sector employment. By investing in various sectors such as technology, tourism, and logistics, we aim to reduce our reliance on oil. Furthermore, to empower young people to participate in the workforce, we are developing vocational training programs, increasing entrepreneurship support, and implementing policies that support women's participation in the workforce. Private sector-university collaborations and innovation centers are key elements of our 2030 goals.

We believe that with all these innovative policies, we will set an example for other countries. Beyond solely considering national interests, we are ready to do our utmost to ensure that young people, the future of our planet, are engaged, productive, and serve as role models for future generations. We believe that international educational collaborations are invaluable in solving this problem. We believe that young people should become global citizens, not just citizens of their own country.
