Topic: Ensuring Access to Education for Refugee Children

Introduction

China is a country in East Asia. It borders countries like Russia, India, and Mongolia, and it is one of the largest countries in the world. China earns money from factories, farming crops like rice, wheat, and tea, and from technology and services. Schools in China are very organized, with nine years of required education, and many students continue to university. Health care has improved, with hospitals and health insurance, but it is better in cities than in rural areas. China also has many different ethnic groups, including the Han Chinese majority and 55 minority groups, each with their own cultures and traditions

Topic and China's Role

Many of the main issues the UN talks about today, like poverty, education, health, war, and helping people, come from problems in the past. These problems were caused by things like colonization, world wars, inequality, and population growth. Powerful countries such as the United States, Russia, China, the United Kingdom, and France have a big influence because they are permanent members of the UN Security Council. China is important because it has a large population, a strong economy, and takes part in development projects, peacekeeping, and global health work. The UN has also created important agreements, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and the Sustainable Development Goals, to help improve life around the world.

Solutions and Conclusion

One possible solution to improve education in China is to collect higher taxes from wealthy families who send their children to elite private schools. For example, if parents earn £34,000 per month and pay £2,000 per month for school fees, the government could take 20% of that school fee as tax. This money could then be used to build and expand free public schools in all regions of China, especially in poorer and rural areas.
