

POSITION PAPER:

Germany's situation after WW2 was dreadful, for example 66% of houses in Cologne were destroyed which led to Millions of Germans becoming homeless. Also due to the intense bombing in city's. Both eastern and western sides of Germany were trying to escape the war, This just shows how bad Germany's situation after WW2 was. Because of the war the German government focused on reconstruction and development.

We think that the German government acknowledges their commitment to solve their problem of reconstruction and development in post conflict regions through a combination of official policy, contributions and much more.

We also think that the German government provides enough funds to solve their problem of reconstruction and development, which can be proved by the German government surpassing the world's largest economies in this target, The German government has something called "the stabilization fund" which is managed by the foreign office and this fund is key to rapid funding, which can be one of the reasons that unlike other nations the German government provides rapid funding for immediate measures that back political processes in the right amount of time.

Germany's integrated approach to solve their problem of reconstruction and development is strategic and efficient, and manages to reach results. For example one of the reasons this approach was "integrated" is that it did not rely on a single policy but combined several mutually reinforcing elements. Another reason why Germany's integrated approach is very efficient is because the German government addresses their root causes by putting high effort on their approach.

The German government's solution to fixing their problem of reconstruction and development after WW2 is by improving their integrated approach and the primary goal is to make security and development policy more effective in achieving sustainable results.
