

Country: Italy

Committee: United Nations Security Council

Italy has always been an active member of the United Nations Security Council whenever it has been a present member, and it continues to provide unwavering support for its mission of maintaining international peace and security to this day. Italy emphasizes the importance of civilian security and having a common ground in international waters and lands. The Cyprus problem has special importance for Italy as it has a border with the Mediterranean Sea.

Italy's policy has always been based on not siding with any of the parties involved, but rather on siding with peace, as well as the belief that tensions in the international arena should be reduced and solutions should be found through negotiations. Italy would only support efforts to resolve the Cyprus issue through UN agreements and resolutions. Italy has always emphasized that in its international relations, members must refrain from threatening or using force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or any application which would not align with the United Nations founding values.

Italy would continue to emphasize the significance of previous resolutions such as "Security Council Resolution 186: The Cyprus Question," and their effective implementation should be overseen by the Security Council itself. What Italy would propose is that parties who refuse to cooperate with the resolutions face sanctions determined by the Security Council members. Italy would act in concert with any solution idea that is consistent with our ultimate goal, international peace.
