People's Republic of China is opposed to proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their delivery means. While China has established a nuclear force of herself to protect her national independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity she still is and stands by following "No First Use" policy, and regards the weapons as means of peacekeeping and preventing of wars.

China is ready to work with the international community to promote the development and improvement of the non-proliferation regime and make contribution to international peace, stability and development.

China believes that non-proliferation efforts should follow the principal of seeking both temporary and permanent solutions to, and these solutions should be sought through political and diplomatic means. A general improvement in international relations is both the fundamental way to eliminate threats and the precondition and guarantee for international non-proliferation endeavours. To establish a just, fair and effective regime should be the orientation for international non-proliferation efforts. Such efforts should be non-discriminatory and without prejudice to the security of all countries and ensure the rights of every country to the peaceful uses of advanced science and technology and to normal international cooperation in this field.

China has been consistently improving its export control system and gradually establishing and improving its legal system of export control based on licensing management. To date, China has established a comprehensive export control system on sensitive items with its export control regulations fully covering nuclear, biological, chemical, missiles and all other relevant military products. These efforts brought China's export control principles and measures in the field of non-proliferation fully in line with international practices.
